112 Weighing plate, modest in size (see below), pierced with 3 suspension holes and bearing a mark stamped in a rectangular cartridge: BANNA or BANNAF (ecit) (several different stamps) *. Copper-alloy, 3,61 grams, 20 mm. Circa 2nd-3rd century AD. A cast bronze convex disc with three regularly spaced piercings, probably the pan from a balance. On the inner face a stamped inscription 'BANNAF', probably for Banna f [ecit], 'Banna made [this]'. At Chester-le-Street, County Durham, England, an inscription from the Roman town (Concangis) reads 'DEO DIGENIS BANNAI' meaning 'To the god Digenis, (the people) of Banna (made / erected this)'. Banna is probably the Roman name for one of the local settlements or military outposts. The small size of the pan implies that it would have been used for measuring small quantities of very high-value materials such as gold. Reference: Reference: Read, B. The obverse depiction of Pan is a punning allusion to the cognomen Pansa. Gaius Vibius Pansa Caetronianus was tribune in 51 BC and supported Gaius Julius Caesar in the civil war. After Caesar's assassination, however, he became one of the leading proponents for the return of the Republic, and was elected consul in 43 BC, with Aulus Hirtius. The two took command of the senatorial legions, marching north to engage Mark Antony, now an enemy of the Roman Senate. On April 14, 43 BC, the two forces clashed at the Battle of Forum Gallorum. Although the Senate's forces proved victorious, Hirtius was killed in battle and Pansa was wounded and died a few days later. Marcus Agrippa had been a boyhood friend of Augustus and he would become his leading military strategist throughout the civil war. If not for the cunning and strategic prowess of Agrippa it is doubtful that Octavian would have been successful. Surely Octavian, now renamed Augustus, was aware of this and had the senate bestow great powers on Agrippa. Agrippa would end up having authority almost equal to Augustus himself. Clearly the intention was to allow Agrippa to succeed the emperor. 100
