Crawford 500/3 Very fine, good very fine. Scarce coin!! Lentulus Spinter is perhaps the son of Spinter, consul in 57, who became legendary for his lavish expenditure while aedile and praetor and whose taste, as evidenced by the bust of Libertas, was influenced by rich post-Sullan late Hellenistic style that characterises the period of Pompey's triumphs. The spelling of Leibertas is self-consciously archaic, evoking ancient virtues in a style redolent of denarii issued earlier under Brutus. The reverse type symbolises the augurate of Spinter (or, of course, Cassius), authenticating his activities as moneyer. 120

Complete legends, perfectly struck in flan, great exemplar!. Built by Trajan at his own expense and commemorated with an arch at its beginning in Beneventum, as well as on his coinage, the Via Traiana was a quicker route for travellers from Rome to Brundisium on the coast. At 205 miles, despite being two miles longer than the Via Appia, the Via Traiana was a much less arduous and therefore faster option than the original Republican road because it traversed a significantly flatter route to the north. Strabo, in his Geography (6.3.7), indicates that the route of the Via Traiana, even though in his day little more than a mule track, saved the traveller a whole day's journeying. 120

GALLIENVS AVG Radiate and cuirassed bust of Gallienus to right. / LEG IIII FL VI P VI F, lion leaping right. RIC V 343; MIR 36, 1002r; RSC 500. nEF. Rare. According to the author of the Historia Augusta, the reign of Gallienus represented one of the lowest points in Roman imperial history. Although faced by no less than thirty different usurpers, including the Gallic emperors and Zenobia, the emperor was reputed to have spent his time instead writing poetry and sleeping on a rose-covered bed. While modern historical interpretation has taken a less hostile view, it is nevertheless clear that the Gallienus' relationship with the legions was an important one; hence this commemorative series. Unfortunately, it was this need to support the military that contributed to the financial crisis of the mid-third century. 100
