Martin Huth has argued that this series was struck on 'folded flans' which were prepared by hammering an existing coin to obliterate its design and then folding it once, then hammering together two such pieces before striking, resulting in a triangular shape (Huth, 'Monetary Circulation' in CKK, pp. 86-7). The Al-Jawf Hoard contained 21 tetrachms struck on flans produced in this way and were found alongside numerous heavily bent Alexander III type tetrachms (some Arabian imitations, see nos. 210-229 and 232-246). Huth suggests that the deformation of the Alexander III types may have been a way of invalidating coinage entering South Arabia, preventing its entry into local circulation and may have provided the raw material for new flans (ibid, p. 88). Despite this, Huth notes that the large size of the Alexander tetrachms were not conducive to the method of production used to create the flans for the striking of the imitative Athens tetrachms. The source material for flans used to strike this series of imitative Athens tetrachms probably came from elsewhere and the exact reasons for this seemingly unnecessarily complicated method of production remain unclear. The likely burial date of the hoard is thought to be around the turn of the second century BC and the folded Alexander type tetrachms date to the first half of the second century BC. This series of imitative Athens tetrachms were probably produced around the same time the Alexander tetrachms were circulating and the find spot suggests they were struck by one of the small states situated in the Wadi al-Jawf. Huth suggests the importance of the trading activities of Ma'in during this period, when other South Arabian states were minting their own coins, and its nature as a loose confederation of states make it a possible candidate for the attribution of this coinage (ibid, p. 89). Martin Huth has argued that this series was struck on 'folded flans' which were prepared by hammering an existing coin to obliterate its design and then folding it once, then hammering together two such pieces before striking, resulting in a triangular shape (Huth, 'Monetary Circulation' in CKK, pp. 86-7). RIC 2. CBN 3. Very rare. Nicely toned, two lovely portraits, well struck on a sound metal, Extrtremely Fine. Few of Rome's emperors enjoy as foul a reputation as Gaius, who is generally known by the nickname Caligula, meaning 'bootikin' or 'little boots', which he received from his father's soldiers while he was still an amiable child. He grew to despise the nickname almost as much as everyone grew to despise him. There is little need to revisit the list of his debaucheries, incests and acts of depravity - we need only note that his behaviour was a special blend of intellect and insanity, and that he has few peers beyond Nero, Commodus and Elagabalus. On the bright side, Caligula was dutiful when it came to his well-produced coinage. Caligula honoured his great-grandfather Augustus, very likely Tiberius (see below), his murdered parents, Germanicus and Agrippina Senior, and his murdered brothers, Nero Caesar and Drusus Caesar. Among the living he honoured his three sisters - in whom he had more than a casual interest - and, on provincial coinage, his final wife Caesonia and their daughter Drusilla Minor, both of whom were murdered within an hour of Caligula. This denarius belongs to an issue that is far more mysterious than generally known. It is attributed to Lugdunum, where Caligula may have struck only gold and silver during his inaugural year, and where the radiate portrait comes in two varieties: 1) without inscription and flanked by two stars (the type offered here), 2) without stars and with the inscription DIVVS AVG PATER PATRIAE (all issues attributed to Rome are of this second type). This duality invites us to speculate that the radiate portrait on the anepigraphic type offered here is actually Tiberius, and that the two stars represent Augustus and Julius Caesar - the only two men who had been deified. This becomes all the more likely if we consider that Caligula made an initial request for Tiberius' deification, but he dropped the matter not long after he returned to Rome and learned at first hand how poor the public sentiment was for Tiberius. Along with his change of heart, Caligula may have abandoned the anepigraphic type in favour of the issue that explicitly identifies the radiate head as Divus Augustus, which he continued to strike each and every year to the end of his reign. Few of Rome's emperors enjoy as foul a reputation as Gaius, who is generally known by the nickname Caligula, meaning 'bootikin' or 'little boots'. which he received from his father's soldiers while
