ΕΠΙ Μ ΟΥΕΤΤΙΟΥ ΝΙΓΡΟΥ / ΚΟΙΝΟΝ ΦΡΥΓΙΑΣ ΑΠΑΜΕΙΣ Marsyas advancing right, playing double flute. RPC I 3137. SNG Copenhagen 208. Very fine. Marsyas was a Phrygian satyr connected to the worship of Dionysos via his flute playing: he was one of the Tityroi, the double-flute playing satyrs in the train of the god. Legend said that it was Marsyas who invented flute playing. The story goes that Athena had crafted the very first flute, but discarded it because she did not like how it disfigured her cheeks when she blew into it. Marsyas found it and played it beautifully. He felt that he was so good that he challenged the god Apollo to a musical contest, the winner to determine the fate of the loser. Apollo won, of course, and after tying Marsyas to a tree he flayed him alive for his presumption of challenging him. However, various - less bloody - versions of the story exist. RIC VII p. 608, 45. Extremely rare. Rough surfaces, otherwise , very fine. From a European collection. Licinius I made Martinian his co-emperor following his defeat by Constantine at Adrianople on 3 July 324. Eight years before Licinius had done the same with his general Valerius Valens, who was then subsequently executed as a condition of the peace treaty. Martinian must have thought about that when he accepted his promotion from Licinius' magister officorum (head of the civil service) to that of co-emperor. Surviving coins reveal that he had the title of Augustus - most of the literary sources only describe him as having held the rank of Caesar. The war, however, continued on its disastrous path. Licinius was no better prepared to meet Constantine a second time, especially since Constantine was determined to make his victory complete. The armies were enormous: the combined land forces exceeded 250,000 men and the seas were crowded with some 500 ships. From the first Licinius was forced to retreat and fall back to the Bosphorus. He had ordered Martinian to raise reinforcements to prevent Constantine from crossing into Asia, but Constantine's eldest son Crispus destroyed Licinius' fleet in the Hellespont, thus enabling Constantine's army to cross over to Asia. After Constantine's great victory at Chrysopolis in September 324, Martinian's life was spared thanks to the intervention of Constantia, Constantine's sister and wife of Licinius. He was exiled to Cappadocia, but was executed the following Spring. Weight:3 gr Diameter:21,6 mm

Grade: gVF coin with dark brown patina Well centered, well struck, and includes all legends. Other: Antioch mint, RIC 37.Constantine "The Great" Posthumous issue. "MANVS DEI" the Hand of God. Superb condition & rarely this nice. Constantine I is depicted in a burial shroud. The Christian is called DV (Divus = the divine one) and shown being welcomed to heaven by God. This coin was minted after Constantine's death. The obverse depicts the Emperor in a burial shroud and on the reverse the Emperor driving an ascending (Heaven Bound) quadriga to the Judeo-Christian God's waiting hand. The coin also represents the first Judeo-Christian imagery on a coin. Full legend examples are not easily found since the mints of the day were striking very rapidly due to the need for cash to fuel inflation. Weight:1,6 gr Diameter:15,2 mm
