This coin type was struck 1583-1588. The wildman motif was used on many Brunswick talers of the 16th and 17th centuries, the earliest (dated) being issued by Heinrich the Younger in 1539. The wild man, was a literary and artistic invention of the medieval period. In physical appearance he differed from man mainly in his thick coat of hair, which left only his face, hands, feet - and, with wild women, breasts - bare. Elbows and knees were often exposed. A variant form of the wild man has covered him with a thick growth of leafy foliage rather than hair. Thought to live in remote, mountainous, and forested regions, the wild man especially flourished in the wooded or alpine regions of the German-speaking lands.

Salentin von Isenburg was born the second of three sons of Count Heinrich von Isenburg-Grenzau and Countess Margarethe von Wertheim. He began studying theology at the age of 15 and became a canon in Mainz after his first year in 1548. Both brothers died in the following two years, so it was up to Salentin to continue the family. In addition to Mainz, Salentin also held benefices in Strasbourg and, from 1552, in Cologne. There he became capitular in 1558, scholastic in 1565 and sub-dean in 1567. When he was elected archbishop, he refused to be ordained a priest so that he could later return to the secular state. This antagonized Pope Pius V., but his successor Gregory XIII. sent Salentin the curial confirmation of his office in Cologne in 1573 and offered him as a papal candidate for the bishop's see in Paderborn. Salentin was able to get the financial problems under control and initiate further reforms in the administration of the archbishopric. The most visible success of his financial policy was the redemption of pledges for several territories, including the Vest Recklinghausen. In terms of foreign policy, he aimed to prevent the Dutch uprising from spreading. In 1577, Salentin resigned from office in order to continue his family line. He had chosen Ernst of Bavaria as his successor, but this did not happen at first.
